Abstract: This article analyzes the philosophical legacy of the Uzbek philosopher Ibrohim Mominov and his approach to understanding the interrelation between spirituality and culture. The article demonstrates how, in Mominov's philosophy, spirituality and culture are conceptualized as mutually transformative and interrelated concepts. According to Mominov, spirituality and culture are interconnected and complementary elements, as they constitute the social and moral foundations of society. The article analyzes how Mominov's philosophical perspectives have influenced the spiritual and cultural development of contemporary Uzbek society.

Keywords: Ibrohim Mominov, spirituality, culture, philosophical legacy, Uzbek philosophy, social values, ethics.

It examines Mominov's views on spirituality and culture, exploring their role within Uzbek philosophy and society. Furthermore, it elucidates the significance of his ideas in contemporary Uzbek society and their influence on the development of social culture.

In Ibrohim Mominov's philosophical system, the interrelation between spirituality and culture holds a central place. According to him, spirituality and culture play a vital role in the development of society. In his philosophical outlook, he defines spirituality as moral values, faith, and the inner world of humanity, while he regards culture as the external manifestation of these values.

- Spirituality: Mominov conceptualizes spirituality as the inner world of a person, including their moral and spiritual development, faith, and worldview. He posits that human spiritual values play a pivotal role in addressing moral and social problems within society. According to Mo'minov, the strength of spirituality significantly impacts the healthy development of society.

Culture and Upbringing. In Mominov's view, culture is considered a significant factor in shaping the upbringing of society. Culture primarily serves the intellectual and spiritual development of an individual and helps form their worldview. Cultural values, moral norms, and ideas in society not only influence personal development but also affect one's perception of their role and position within the community. Ibrohim Mominov placed great emphasis on the interconnection between spirituality and culture, studying how these two concepts unite in society and the kind of influence they should exert. According to him, the advancement of spirituality shapes culture, while changes in culture, in turn, renew spiritual values. The interconnection and mutual reinforcement of these processes contribute to a more stable and developed society. Through Mominov's perspective, we can observe a new dimension in Uzbek thought, highlighting the role of spirituality and culture in shaping society and the importance of social values. He presented culture and spirituality as crucial tools in the transformation and improvement of society.

Conclusion

Ibrohim Mominov's philosophical legacy is based on a deep analysis of the relationship between spirituality and culture. He regarded spirituality and culture as mutually reinforcing and interconnected concepts, defining their role in the development of society. According to Mo'minov, spirituality and culture not only shape an individual's inner world but also determine their social role, moral responsibility, and interactions within society. He viewed spirituality not merely as a source of personal development but also as an essential component for social progress and societal stability. Culture, in turn, materializes these processes by applying values, traditions, customs, and moral norms in practice. Mominov's approach to understanding the relationship between spirituality and culture helped shape a new phase of Uzbek philosophy. In his scholarly work, he presented spirituality and culture as the spiritual and cultural foundations of society. This perspective has had a significant impact on the modern development of Uzbek social thought. Social justice, human rights, moral norms, and cultural values in Mominov's philosophy form an interconnected system. His philosophy aimed at renewing the moral, cultural, and social foundations of Uzbek society, increasing citizens' cultural literacy, and meeting the spiritual needs of the people. His scholarly approach shaped the main directions of Uzbek thought for the contemporary era and contributed to creating new social values in society.

Furthermore, understanding the relationship between spirituality and culture in Mominov's philosophy remains an important part not only of Uzbek society but also of Eastern philosophy in general. His ideas, beyond their historical significance, continue to be relevant for addressing social, cultural, and moral issues in contemporary society.
